It looks like this: App.User.reopenClass({ templateName: function(){ console.log('change'); return 'users/user'; } }); App.UsersView = Ember.View.extend({ templateName: function(){ console.log('render'); return 'users/user'; } }); The users.html template looks like this: {{outlet}} When I load the page the render function of the users view fires. Then, I click on an element in the users template to change the template to user. The change in the templateName function fires first, then the render function fires. Is there a way to set this up so that the render function fires first and then the templateName method is called? A: You will need to call the App.User.reopenClass method from your UsersView. App.UsersView = Ember.View.extend({ templateName: function(){ console.log('render'); return 'users/user'; }, isUser: function(){ return true; }.property('templateName') }); Template name is a computed property so is
